Work in Progress

"The Politics of Association: Law and the Structuring of Rights, Restraints, and Resources in the U.S., 1900-1940." Proposal funded by NSF, January 2000.

AFrom Legislation to Innovation: Organizational Lessons from Arizona=s Charter Schools.@ Proposal funded by the Spencer Foundation, January 2001.

These projects serve as bookends to a larger study of the relations between associations and formal political institutions. Empirically, this study reconstructs an overlooked dimension of American political history. Theoretically, it provides a site for advancing our understanding of how and when organizational heterogeneity and innovation contribute to processes of institutional change and reproduction.

The first project explores the constitution, regulation, and funding of associations at the state-level in the decades prior to the establishment of a national welfare state. Through coding of state legislation and focused studies of particular states, I address the role of patronage and electoral competition in structuring the organizational field of associations. Two papers from this project have been written for conferences. "The Politics of Benevolence" (with Hughes, Nelson and Roberts) is being revised for submission to a journal; "State Building or Blurring" was written for invited presentation at a conference sponsored by the Yale Department of Political Science and will be revised for the conference volume.

The second project exploits an experiment in using policy to reconstruct a core element of public social provision: education. Arizona has both the most permissive charter school law in the nation and the largest population of these schools. An analysis of this organizational population illuminates how policy can (or cannot) be an instrument of deinstitutionalization or the making of quasi-markets.
